Greniers Ä Ä sol (salt granaries dating from 1342) were established in each province, and to these all salt had to be taken by the producer on penalty of confiscation. The grenier fixed the price which it paid for the salt and then sold it to retail dealers at a higher rate. The important differences in cost between various pays clearly show the reason behind the active contraband of salt that took place in France until the gabelle was abolished. The obvious idea was to buy salt in a region where it was cheap and to sell it under the coat in regions where it was expensive, at a higher price, but still less than the legal price. Such smugglers were called faux-sauniers, from faux ("false") and the root sau-, referring to salt. In turn, the customs guards tasked with arresting the faux-sauniers were nicknamed gabelous, a term obviously derived from the gabelle they sought to uphold. Faux-sauniers were sentenced to the galleys if they were caught without weapons, and to death if caught with weapons. In 1675, the red bonnets in Brittany rebelled against the gabelle. They expressed a list of demands in a document known as the peasant code. In this document, the gabelle was personified, as was common in this age, especially with death and plague. The prices are quoted from De la rÄÄvolution de 1789 Ä Ä la rÄÄvolution de 1848 by Isaac, Alba, Michaud and Pouthas, Hachette, 1960. " -#### #####55 million vivres per year, or more than 10 percent of the real government's tax revenue. The Gabelle was widely unpopular because all of them paid, including the peasants. It was also very difficult to avoid. Tariffs and boosting the import or trade of food, beverages and consumer goods were also indirectly taxed. These impositions took the form of taxes, customs duties and tariffs. The wine, the most popular alcoholic drink in the 18th century in France, was subject to a great special called assistant. A similar tax called TABAC applied to the sale of tobacco. The features were a series of customs duties, payable by traders who imported goods from abroad or from one province to another. The Octroi was a municipal tariff for goods entering large cities, particularly Paris. These tasks and implements affected traders, traders and entrepreneurs more than individuals. Indirect taxes were so important that many French cities maintained high medieval walls; this forced the goods to the city to pass through the gates, where they were inspected and encumbered. "The most indirect taxes were collected by 40 fermiers-gen-g © neux or Caraballizantes' rich people who acquired the right to collect taxes on behalf of the government. This was a company so profitable that each Fermier G -Neux paid the real government up to 80 million vivres for a six-year lease. In good economic times, when production and trade increased, some tax farmers made several million vivres per year. This privatized and unregulated method of tax collection was naturally open to abuse and corruption. The methods of collection used by the fermiers-gen-neux and their agents could be arbitrary, heavy and, torturhal. By the reign of Louis XVI, the Fermiers-G -neux had become one of the richest groups in France. They bought Grand Homes along Vend me, venal offices and noble titles of Paris. Fiscal liabilities varied widely in France. The gabelle or salt tax, for example, was greatly raisedAmounts in parade and surrounding provinces that in southern France. The nobility and clergy were also exempt from some direct taxes. 5. A common opinion in the day of 1780 was that the third heritage was being overloaded and forced to bring the fiscal burden of the first and second farm. While reality was more complex, it was clear that the tax ride had a great need for reform.
